Each table typically has a primary key column. This column is a unique value per row and serves as the identifier for the row.

A table can have many foreign keys as well. A foreign key is a column that contains values to link the table to the other tables.